VOCALIST AND HARPIST BENJAMIN BAGBY BRINGS
BEOWULF: THE EPIC IN PERFORMANCE
TO ZELLERBACH PLAYHOUSE OCTOBER 26 - 30 AT 8:00 P.M.

BERKELEY, September 15, 2010—Cal Performances presents musician and scholar Benjamin Bagby in five performances of the medieval tale of Beowulf: The Epic in Performance in Zellerbach Playhouse Tuesday through Saturday, October 26 to 30, at 8:00 p.m. Bagby, who recites the Beowulf story in its original Anglo-Saxon language (with English supertitles) and accompanies himself on Anglo-Saxon harp, uses a rich kit of dramatic tools including facial gestures, vocal swoops and whispers, to enliven his performance of this ancient story of heroism, sacrifice, and bravery. Bagby’s performance of Beowulf is “a triumphant demonstration of the power of storytelling and our deep-seated need to share stories” (Guardian Unlimited, Manchester, UK).

In a related Artist’s Talk, Bagby and Dr. Stefan Morent of Tuebingen University in Germany will meet in Zellerbach Playhouse on Friday, October 29 at noon in Zellerbach Playhouse to discuss the reconstruction and performance of medieval works. This conversation is presented in association with the UC Berkeley Committee on Medieval Studies and Center for British Studies, and is free and open to the public.

Benjamin Bagby’s performance of Beowulf is simultaneously musically deft, theatrically exciting, and historically informed. Although he is a trained singer, Bagby has said that, when performing Beowulf, “I enter with my voice into a world which is informed as much by the actor’s art as by the singer’s.” The British Theatre Guide called his performance, “a hybrid of song and recitation,” and the Berkshire Review for the Arts said, “Bagby has bridged the language gap and made it possible for modern audiences to share something like the enjoyment a medieval scop’s audience would have experienced in a bardic performance.”

The Anglo-Saxon poem called Beowulf is found as a single, unique manuscript, dating back to the early eleventh century, and is now housed in the British Library. The written tale of Beowulf that survives represents only one version—and perhaps not the best version—of a story that developed in an always-changing oral tradition centuries ago. Scholars disagree on the age of the poem itself—some have suggested that it could have been created as early as the sixth century—but most agree that the story arose among the bardic storytellers, or scops, who were essential elements of tribal society in early medieval England. Contemporaneous accounts say that scops told their stories in song and speech, self-accompanied on six-stringed harps. (Musical notation was not used at the time, and only fragments of such instruments survive.) In its day, every performance of Beowulf—like any bardic performance—would be unique, subtle, and tuned to its audience.

The epic poem tells the heroic story of a young warrior named Beowulf and the three battles he must endure. First Beowulf is called upon to defeat Grendel, a monster that plagues the mead hall of King Hrothgar of Denmark. Beowulf then must defeat Grendel’s mother, a hag who comes to the hall seeking revenge. Years later, when he is a powerful ruler, Beowulf fights a vicious dragon; he is victorious, but dies from wounds received in this final battle.

Benjamin Bagby created his performance of Beowulf in 1990 and delivers it only 10 to 20 times a year. Bagby’s Beowulf has been presented in several historic and significant venues, including The Cloisters in New York, The British Library in London (as part of the four-day “Beowulf 1000” celebration that included a display of the surviving manuscript), the Edinburgh International Festival, and the Coolidge Auditorium at the Library of Congress. When presenting Beowulf, Bagby accompanies himself on a six-stringed Anglo-Saxon harp, built by Rainer Thurau of Wiesbaden, Germany, which was reconstructed from the remains of an oak instrument excavated from a seventh-century nobleman’s grave south of Stuttgart, Germany.
